

Roses: Parents Gift to Therapist as Indicator of Client's Psychogenesis

William Freedman*

Department of English, University of Haifa, Haifa 31905, Israel

*Corresponding author: William Freedman, Department of English, University of Haifa, Haifa 31905 Israel, Tel: 972-4-8107296; Fax: 972-4-8107461; E-mail: freedman@research.haifa.ac.il

Received: March 03, 2015, Accepted: March 24, 2015, Published: March 31, 2015

Copyright: © 2015 William F. This is an open-access article distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution License, which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original author and source are credited.

Poem

I treated once a twenty-year-old boy who committed himself soon after.
No connection, I like to think, unless he learned there what he should have known.
But the point is, six months later, his parents, who thanked me often but who hadn't paid, sent me, on no particular occasion, two-hundred and forty roses.
Amazed, I counted them twice.
I spent hours finding and filling glasses, jugs and vases to hold them, looking for their phone number,
to thank them,
but I'd thrown it out or never had it.
The next morning,
every one of them was dead.
I gathered
it was the way they loved.